I am thinking of a future where children have never seen animals in fields. Where there are no country lanes, wildlife, wildflowers, trees etc.

I understand we need houses, but to build on green belt is wrong. Housing developments are springing up, with so little space between the houses, and 'gardens', if you can call them that, overlooked from every angle.

Big old trees help to keep the air purer yet they are 'slaughtered' without a thought as to how beautiful they are that they are part of the landscape. We need green belt and that is why it was originally designated as green belt.

Do we want a concrete world? NO.

Leave the green belt as it was meant to be. An appendage to our housing developments. Keeping the level between concrete and nature under control.

People need green belts to walk in and they need to see trees, birds - mental health will suffer if it all becomes concrete.

I am sure that some compromise can be reached. All it takes is a little effort and a will to do the right thing by man and the environment he lives in.

I hope to hear v soon that the plans have become kinder to both man and beast.
